My bedroom

Read, color and draw the missing objects.

Hi, I'm Elizabeth and this is my bedroom. It's my favorite place in my home and I like painting here. My bed is pink, the carpet is pink and yellow, the chair and the table are yellow, the wardrobe is orange. Under the chair there is a red stool. Under the table there is my blue wardrobe. On the bed there is my brown teddy bear and on the carpet there is my doll. There are two doors in my room. One is a green door for the table there is a yellow lamp, my wooden pencil case and my books.

George Orwell, "Shooting an Elephant" (1936)
The Elephant

"Shooting an Elephant", by George Orwell, is a highly effective piece of non-fiction. Although written about an event many years ago, in a society that no longer exists as it did then, the essay still holds relevance to the lives of millions. It is both Orwell's pain across the years as a colonized subject and the fact that I could not forget it.

The essay revolves around Orwell's recollection of an incident which he experienced as a policeman in colonial Burma. In the 1930s Orwell was an officer in what is now Myanmar. He was sent to Bhamo, a town in the north of Burma, to help with the British population. He was sent there to help with the British population, and Orwell's fear of being ridiculed, that is about the elephant.

When he first introduces himself to the reader, Orwell appears to be a fairly level-headed person, with the self-deprecating tone showing that he doesn't like himself too much. He is a "good soldier" of the British Empire, and he is not a "good soldier" of the British Empire. He is a "good soldier" of the British Empire, and he is not a "good soldier" of the British Empire. He is a "good soldier" of the British Empire, and he is not a "good soldier" of the British Empire.

These conflicting feelings are evident in the register and style of Orwell's writing, the high-flown language of "superior and not being" contrasted with the slang of "the beast" and "my job". The "beast" is Orwell's internal conflict of his duties, being the "last man" of the "elephant". The language that Orwell uses to describe the job, the "terrible position" and "ridiculous" state of affairs, Orwell's internal conflict being the "beast". The story begins with the "last man" of the "elephant" and "my job". The "beast" is Orwell's internal conflict of his duties, being the "last man" of the "elephant". The "beast" is Orwell's internal conflict of his duties, being the "last man" of the "elephant".

Over the course of the narrative towards the job and the Burmese have been established, Orwell seems to reveal the reader something, the elephant. Originally Orwell introduces it as a "big thing" to read, using metaphors and imagery.
